

Audrey Black

MS, 2025
Columbia University

Audrey Black is a producer, communications professional, and 2025 graduate of Columbia University's M.S. in Strategic Communication program. Her work spans digital media, live events, brand partnerships, and audience development. She most recently served as Lead Producer for a Vox Media podcast. She also produces independent comedy projects, including web series and live shows, and is a contributing writer for digital publications, including For Them. At Columbia, she founded Proud Professionals, the first LGBTQ society for graduate students at large. She brings an emerging professional's perspective on navigating a changing workforce, developing transferable skills, and building a career across creative and business disciplines.